“ My grandfather

He taught us to be strong, to be a man, to swallow what we couldn't explain. I learned this from my father as he did before me. I wish he learned to cry, the cry that is yelped as we drink. Because he did that so well. Although this is as many remember Mr.bravo El bravo. It is a false representation of who he was because he could not voice the love or pain inside. The pain from lost children or broken relationships, love he had but was not able to release. My grandfather the man that made the men men, and made men feel more manly. He watched over us, protected us, and made me feel as if no man was as great as him. The same way my father spoke of " your grandpa". The idolization of a man who left behind men regardless of the drinking I remember my grandpa before this had taken place and even after. A man who had few spoken words but the words burned in our memory. A man who left behind women and men who held him higher than he held himself. These things won't be forgotten. My family the love that burns inside us for him burned inside him to. I knew my grandpa the grandfather my grandfather. He ran, jumped and yelled as he chased us through the yard. The man who yelled, argued, and fought. The man that worked hard and never gave up. This is the man I remember. His body is gone but his legacy will live on in our blood and our name. Forever Bravo.
